

Federica MASCI

Phd in Occupational Health and Industrial Hygiene, working at International Center for Rural Health since 2011. Currently research fellow at the Department of Health Science of the University of Milan focusing on risk assessment of biomechanical overload in agricultural workers. Graduate Teaching Assistant at University of Milan for the course “Risk Assessment in work places: Methods and Techniques”; co supervisor of undergraduate students (Italian and foreign) enrolled in “Sciences of Prevention - Public health” master program and “Methods and Approaches for environmental and occupational prevention” bachelor program.

Previous working experiences in Public health Inspection in workplace for local health societies and accidents at work investigations. I also collected working experience in training employees and supervisors on health and safety at work. I have been involved in some work experience in international research - team project in Ergonomics field.